Canette Breast (Female duckling)

Tasting notes of the Curator Canette duck breast does not announce itself loudly. It speaks in a lower register, closer to silk than velvet, closer to autumn leaves than roaring fire. Taken from a young female duck, smaller and lighter than the ducks used for foie gras, the breast is naturally more delicate. The muscle fibers are finer, the fat layer thinner and more even, the flavor more nuanced. Raw, the meat is a soft garnet, almost translucent at the edges, capped with a pale, clean layer of fat that promises crispness without excess. There is no heaviness here. When the skin meets a cold pan and heat is applied slowly, the fat renders patiently, releasing a gentle duck perfume—nutty, faintly sweet, never aggressive. The skin tightens and turns golden, thin as parchment, crackling under the knife. Cooked to rosé, the flesh remains supple and moist, yielding easily but not collapsing. The flavor sits somewhere between poultry and red meat: a clean iron note, a whisper of wildness, and a soft, lingering savoriness that invites silence at the table. Unlike magret, which asserts itself, canette rewards attention. It does not flood the palate; it lingers, unfolding slowly. This is a cut for cooks who value restraint. Overcooked, it loses its grace. Treated gently, it becomes profoundly expressive. There is a sense of balance in canette breast—between fat and lean, sweetness and umami, tenderness and structure—that makes it endlessly adaptable. It is not rustic food. It is intimate food, meant to be sliced carefully, served warm, and eaten with awareness. In the hands of a thoughtful cook, canette duck breast becomes a study in proportion. Nothing dominates. Everything is in dialogue. ### Pairings and Suggestions Canette duck breast shines when paired with ingredients that respect its subtlety rather than overpower it. - Classic pairings - Seasonal fruits such as cherries, figs, or pears, cooked down gently into restrained sauces - Mildly bitter greens like endive, radicchio, or young spinach - Simple reductions made from duck stock, a touch of wine, and careful seasoning - Modern interpretations - Minimalist plating, sliced breast with a single vegetable purée (celeriac, parsnip, or carrot) - Light spice accents—white pepper, coriander seed, or a trace of five-spice, used sparingly - Asian-inspired restraint, paired with soy reduction, ginger, or tea-smoked elements - Cooking approaches - Pan-seared, skin-side down, starting cold to render fat evenly - Finished briefly in the oven, just to bring the core to temperature - Rested properly, allowing juices to settle before slicing - Occasions - Intimate dinners, where conversation matters as much as food - Restaurant-style home cooking, when one wants refinement without complication - Seasonal menus, especially autumn and early winter, when richness is welcome but heaviness is not Canette duck breast prefers clarity over cleverness. One or two well-chosen companions are enough. ### Why the French Prize the Canette In French culinary tradition, the distinction between magret and canette is not academic—it is cultural. Magret, cut from ducks raised for foie gras, carries abundance and power. Canette, by contrast, represents discretion. Historically favored in home kitchens and refined bistros, it was the cut chosen when elegance mattered more than spectacle. The word canette itself refers specifically to the young female duck, traditionally slaughtered before maturity to preserve tenderness. Chefs value it for its predictability and finesse. In classic French cooking schools, canette breast is often used to teach precision: correct rendering of fat, exact doneness, proper resting. There is little room for error, which is precisely the point. In the latter half of the 20th century, as French cuisine began to shift away from excess toward balance, canette quietly gained renewed respect. It aligned perfectly with a more thoughtful gastronomy—less sauce, cleaner plates, better ingredients. Today, it remains a favorite among chefs who cook for themselves rather than for applause. To choose canette is to choose intention. It reflects a culinary philosophy that values listening over declaring, tasting over impressing. It is a reminder that luxury is often found not in size or intensity, but in precision and care.

Dom Pérignon Blanc

Each Dom Pérignon vintage is a meditation on time — a translation of one singular year into liquid form. In a world that often seeks consistency, Dom Pérignon insists on difference: every release is a bold statement of nature’s temperament, interpreted through the Maison’s unwavering precision. The 2013 and 2015 Vintages stand as mirror images across a climatic divide. The first, born of restraint and patience, is a Champagne of tension, purity, and vertical elegance — a sculptor’s Champagne, all edges and light. The second, shaped by warmth and generosity, is radiant and enveloping, an ode to abundance held in perfect balance. Together, they are not opposites but complements — two expressions of Dom Pérignon’s timeless dialogue between discipline and sensuality.

La Cuna Onion Confit

TASTING NOTES FROM THE CURATOR This confit is made with quality selected onions, cooked carefully and allowed to caramelize beautifully. With the addition of sweet wine and olive oil, this is a gorgeous and unique jam. The caramelization gives it a perfect sweetness that is balanced incredibly by the savory flavor of the onions. ### PREPARATION AND PAIRINGS The La Cuna Onion Confit is incredibly versatile, and can be used to accompany so many dishes. Serve a delicious appetizer consisting of La Cuna Onion Confit on bread, and a wedge of Brie on top. Or try it with your potato omelets, or duck and pork dishes. You can even use it in your sandwiches to add a sweet-savory twist to them. If you love making homemade pizzas, use this as topping with either bacon or anchovies. Another option is La Cuna Onion Confit on flatbread with goat cheese and basil. Whatever you decide to do with this sweet-savory onion jam is sure to be spectacular. ### SLOW AND STEADY The French verb "confire," which means "to preserve" was first used in medieval times to refer to fruits that were cooked and preserved in sugar. This is where the word "confit" comes from, which now refers to any type of food which, as a method of preservation, is cooked slowly over a period of time. There is meat confit, fruit confit, and condiment confit. There is an area in Occitan France called "Confit country," where goose fat is used in the cooking process. Usually, as in Provence, olive oil is used, as it is plentiful and cheaper in those parts. "Confit country" is divided into regions depending on which type of meat is most used in confit preparations. Béarn and Basque are associated with goose confit, and the Saintonge and Brantôme regions are associated with duck confit.

La Cuna Black Olive Spread (Tapenade)

TASTING NOTES FROM THE CURATOR A savoury paste made of black olives, olive oil, and oregano, this exquisite tapenade has intense flavor, but smooth and with full olive flavor. It's beautifully salty, with the oregano giving a certain freshness to the taste that balances it all so well. ### PREPARATION AND PAIRINGS The La Cuna Black Olive Spread (Tapenade) is perfect to spread on toast or crackers. Serve it as a dip for appetizers. It's also great as a topping for greens, just add a sprinkling of capers and anchovies, and you have yourself a salad bursting with flavor. Make a great canape by stuffing Portobello mushrooms with this savoury paste, and a dollop of Burrata on top, placing it in an oven for 20 minutes. You can also make a great sandwich with this. Try this Grilled Gruyere with Olive Tapenade and Sun-Dried Tomatoes: Brush two slices of your choice of bread with some olive oil. On one side of one bread slice (oil side down), spread your La Cuna Black Olive Spread (Tapenade). Top with shavings of Parmigiano-Reggiano, two tomato slices, shaved Gruyère, and sundried tomatoes. Top with the second slice of bread, oil side up. On a skillet on medium-high head, place the sandwich on the pan. Gently press with a spatula to flatten the sandwiches. Cook for around 2 minutes on each side, until cheese is melted and bread is toasted. ### TAPENADE TALES The word "tapenade" comes from the Occitan word, "tapena," which means capers. This savoury paste came from a Provençal recipe from 1880. French chef, Jean-Baptiste Reboul, credits the creation of tapenade to the restaurant, La Maison Dorée in Marseille, by a Chef Meynier. According to Reboul, Meynier crushed capers and black olives, mixing in anchovies, and tuna, and adding pepper, cognac, and olive oil, and whipped it all together to fill halves of boiled eggs. The tapenade as we know it now is much simpler, but no less incredible and delicious.

COMPTOIR DE MATHILDE

Comptoir de Mathilde The Noir de Noël – Hazelnut & Vanilla Tea

Tasting Notes from The Curator A festive black tea infused with hazelnut and vanilla—rich, aromatic, and crafted to bring the comforting warmth of the holidays to every sip.Tasting Notes of the Curator This Christmas black tea from Comptoir de Mathilde is built on a smooth, full-bodied tea base that immediately envelopes the palate with warmth. The first aroma that rises is hazelnut—round, gently roasted, and reminiscent of winter pastries cooling on the counter. It brings a nutty depth that feels indulgent yet balanced. As the tea steeps, vanilla softens the edges, creating a creamy sweetness that lingers like a velvet ribbon through the cup. The result is a beautifully layered infusion: bold enough to satisfy black tea lovers, yet soft and fragrant with dessert-like notes. It tastes like the quiet parts of December—mornings spent wrapped in blankets, afternoons with biscuits and good company, evenings glowing softly with warm lights. This is a tea meant to be savoured slowly, letting the hazelnut and vanilla unfold gently with each sip. ### Pairings and Suggestions A versatile, cozy tea for winter rituals. Pair with holiday sweets: gingerbread, almond cookies, truffles, shortbread Enjoy with breakfast breads: brioche, panettone, croissants Serve with light pastries: madeleines, financiers, berry tarts Add a splash of milk or oat milk for a creamy latte-style cup ### A Cup Steeped in Holiday Tradition Black tea blends flavored with nuts and vanilla have long been part of European Christmas tradition—evoking memories of winter markets, festive baking, and long evenings spent indoors. Comptoir de Mathilde transforms that sentiment into a beautifully presented tin, decorated in lush holiday greens and gold. More than just a tea, it's a moment of pause in the midst of the season's rush: warm, nostalgic, and gently indulgent. Every cup feels like a quiet celebration.

Dammann Frères Darjeeling Tea Bags

There exists in the world of tea a single designation that carries more prestige, more poetry, and more genuine warrant for its ambitions than perhaps any other: the Champagne of Teas. Dammann Frères' Darjeeling in Cristal® mesh sachets captures the essence of this Himalayan legend—a tea so refined that it requires nothing but hot water to deliver transcendence, yet rewards the engaged drinker with discoveries that deepen with each encounter.

BOWTIEDUCK.COM

THE BOW TIE DUCK

We believe that food is at the core of what defines Humanity.

The ability to cultivate emerged 12,000 years ago, at the dawn of the Neolithic Revolution. For the first time, Humanity started to be the master of its alimentation.

Agriculture, then, has defined where humanity could settle and what territories where valuable. Where life could blossom.

Better agriculture, better techniques, meant better, more nutritious food. More nutritious food has then allowed humanity to fuel its intellectual capacity. Which allowed refined techniques.

Everyday food is a testament of Humanity's genius. A celebration that we share with our loved ones, our friends, or even strangers.

It is an art, where creativity and discipline, tradition and modernity are intertwined, and its masters, craftmen and chefs, are adored worldwide.

Food is this link between the best of nature and the best of humanity. The generosity of both realms, condensed in a mouthfull.

Food is art. Food is togetherness. Food is nature. Food is humanity.

And this is what we strive to bring to your plate. Everyday.
